We provide unlimited public API support for plugin development, and enterprise server support. Having that in mind, it's likely that you already have some infrastructure in place to detect and/or prevent such attacks. But the cost of implementing an infrastructure and the complexity of the required hardware can be quite high. PCI DSS Policy Version 3.0 What was missing so far was the ability to identify and block cross-site scripting. But you don't need a complex infrastructure to perform the forensics: A simple JavaScript can be executed remotely on any machine connected to the Internet. Note that the threat of cross-site scripting is not limited to external attacks. It can also be used to craft XSS payloads when attackers send malicious queries to a web API. To demonstrate this, we set up a small web API on the Kompany platform, which will take JavaScript calls from the Lumion web viewer or Lumion Software Serial Number Reading (SSRN) internal tool. This tool is built into every Lumion version and is designed to automate the process of finding the serial number of Lumion products. To make things more interesting, we'll run our JavaScript code in the context of the API's user's browser. And since this JavaScript is running in the browser, we'll even be able to execute the same script in the reverse: from the API's point of view. So let's start with a simple web API that will send a JavaScript payload to the caller. First, we need to make the API available to the public: For this, we'll use HTTP Basic Authentication. With this simple API, we'll demonstrate that Lumion malicious code can be executed in a fairly straightforward manner. For første gang bliver endnu en bekendt af familien Martin i Aarhus Peter, der er bekendt med bandekriminalitet, nu tæt på straf i døgnet. Han er en af de knap 11 personer, som står bag en ny bandekriminalitet, siger Jens Martin Andersen, der er forsvarsadvokat for familien. Det er politi, anklagere og bagmænd, der står bag næste stigning i bandekriminaliteten 82157476af
